By now we probably all have a love-hate relationship with zoom. Being isolated, we've had to adapt and reinvent our new normal. Our living rooms became make-shift offices, virtual gatherings became a game of solving technical issues, and it all quickly led to some major zoom fatigue.

But this is about how we learnt to love zoom.

We found a way to stay connected during a time of loneliness. It became essential to see familiar faces and just practice small talk.
We fell in love with being able to show up from our home - in our underwear!
We reached out to old friends, learnt new skills, and carried through awkward silences.
We even started to enjoy little interruptions from pets and kids.

We built new ways to be together. We found new ways to stay connected.
