Wherever we find rigid and immovable systems, we can count on the energy of the anomaly to come in and swiftly transform pressurized patterns into something responsively vibrant. The energy of "feminine" contribution (regardless of gender or sex) has always been a catalytic force that expands the static and outdated into dynamic newness. Here a hand blossoms open trails of flowers, some soft and some pointed, representing the diversity of expressive growth. Erupting through hard-edged opaque bars representing the heavy, uniform legacy of "masculine" energetic assemblage, this piece suggests whether locked-down by overt physical circumstance or tacit social systemic barriers, the work of the "feminine" will continue to spiral upwards and outwards until that which seeks to overpower and undermine is transformed anew, from root to summit.
